

Martin Luther King

After I read from Dr. Kings "Letter from Birmingham Jail" I feel about as follows. No, we are not all connected in the way he describes in the short description because there are some people in the world that are terrible people like Kim Jung Un, Joseph Stalin, and Lee Harvey Oswald. They are a few of the terrible people in the world, so that's one of the many reasons why we're not all connected. Also, we don't appreciate people enough even if they just do something small or even something large and very important.

Another way we're not connected is not everyone is the nicest person in the world and a lot of people are really mean. For example, only about 75% of the worlds people are nice leaving that other 25% are mean people. Even though some people are nice there's still a lot of mean people even though good usually rises above the bad and usually good wins. People still choose to be mean for their laughs or to make them feel better by making others feel worse About themselves. I belive it makes them feel a sense of pride and they think they will feel happier because others are suffering.

Another way we're not connected is people have an extreme hatred for each other. They dislike the way people do things and thing they are superior in every way, even though they're not. They're probably even worse they think they are. They think they're great and awesome even though they aren't. In fact, they usually end up hurting people more than they're helping them. Then more and more people start disliking the person and then they get meaner. That's one of the many reasons why we're not connected but there are so many more.

By: Jack Zander

